Maret

It is well documented that in the latter half of the war, when the Maret's POWs numbered in the millions, they began to struggle with finding places to hold their prisoners. Reports began flooding in from the battlefield of soldiers whipped up into a frenzy, charging into lines of armour and fortified positions with no regard for their own safety. It was later confirmed, after several investigations, that Maret had begun drafting their prisoners, administering psychoactive narcotics that caused the user to become hyper aggressive and see monstrous hallucinations, and putting them on the front lines of battle, forcing ally to fight ally.
